Although suburban medical practices that offer specialty and ancillary services usually function independently, Penn Medicine has a much more integrated model; all physicians use the same electronic medical record that is linked across the health system to streamline patient care.

specialty care physician group, says the idea to open a center like Penn Medicine Valley Forge started back in 1993 when Clinical Care Associates was first established.

"Initially, the idea was to develop a primary care network in the Philadelphia metropolitan area to integrate with specialty services that would remain downtown or in separate community sites," says Dr. Barg, a board-certified geriatric and internal medicine physician. "We also wanted it to act as a primary care educational opportunity for undergraduate and graduate medical education, and function as a clinical research network in collaboration with faculty researchers. With experience, we realized that it was important to integrate primary care, specialty care and ancillary services in common locations.

"This offers patients a single location for multiple services and, in many cases, local residents do not have to travel downtown to access the excellent care and physicians of Penn Medicine."

Suburban medical practices that offer specialty and ancillary services usually function independently. Penn Medicine has a much more integrated model, where multiple specialties deliver care in larger clinical spaces sharing staff and facilities. All physicians use the same electronic medical record that is linked across the health system to enhance communication and streamline patient care.

"Staff can focus on a patient and his or her medical needs that go across multiple specialties," says Dr. Barg. "For example, a patient can make appointments with multiple specialties through a single staff member. This puts the patient squarely in the middle, with the health care delivery team working in concert to deliver care. The medical record includes a patient portal that allows patients to have direct access to their physician's office and their patient chart for a variety of functions.

"We talk all the time about focusing on the patient," Dr. Barg continues. "This integrated approach, which includes facilities, processes and health information technology, facilitates a coordinated approach to the patient. For less complex patient problems, this represents a convenience; for higher-acuity patients, this results in improved outcomes, lower cost and enhanced patient safety."

Continuum of Care

In addition to the integration that occurs at the various centers, Penn Medicine's technology systems allow for integration that is not restricted to a single Penn Medicine's location, but goes across the network of locations. Physicians can access the same electronic medical record at the Ruth and Raymond Perelman Center for Advanced Medicine on the Hospital of the University of Pennsylvania campus, at Penn Medicine Valley Forge or any other Penn Medicine facility. This level of integration allows for patients to be seen close to home for most of their care, but still receive selective high-acuity care at a centralized site in a coordinated fashion.

Along with primary care and specialty practices, Penn Medicine Valley Forge is home to the Henry P. Erdman Educational Center, which serves as a key training site for hundreds of students from the Perelman School of Medicine at the University of Pennsylvania. A portion of the building's $30-million construction cost was funded by the Henry P. Erdman Trust, created nearly 100 years ago to further the development of Penn educational programs in the Valley Forge area.

Penn Medicine is in the process of developing new sites at a time when energy conservation and close attention to the environment have taken on an enhanced importance. Penn Medicine Valley Forge is a LEED-certified (Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design) and has the second-largest plant-covered "green roof" in the region, second to the PECO building. LEED certification provides independent, third-party verification that a building project meets the highest green building and performance measures. The building is designed to reduce water runoff and uses less energy.

"Our goal is to improve the health of our patients," says Dr. Barg. "Part of this is maintaining a healthy environment. Developing buildings consistent with this principle is something to which we are attentive."

Future plans call for the building to house an ambulatory surgery center and additional clinical programs. Many of the practices offer extended hours in the evenings and on weekends to accommodate the needs of patients.
